The dorsal roots of the trigeminal nerves are densely innervated by mechanosensory neurons that are primary afferents in the trigeminal sensory system. Electrical activity of these neurons is induced in the spinal cord by tactile stimulation of the face or teeth of the ipsilateral side. The relationships between facial somatosensory neurons are far less well defined. This study tested the hypothesis that the trigeminal sensory neurons innervating the face are electrically coupled in the superior colliculus. Extracellular potentials were recorded from single units in the midcollicular portion of the deep layers of the superior colliculus of unrestrained Mongolian gerbils (Meriones unguiculatus) in response to stimulation of the trigeminal ganglion. A population of neurons was activated from the contralateral side by stimulation of the alveolar nerves. These neurons were identified as catecholaminergic (CA-positive) cells, as they were antidromically activated from the dorsomedial caudate nucleus. The majority of CA-positive cells, regardless of whether they were excited by alveolar nerve stimulation or not, discharged in a tonic firing pattern. All of these neurons were electrically coupled with one another. The putative synaptic currents that were evoked in these neurons included a fast, synaptic-like current component, most likely resulting from excitatory neurotransmitter release. The slow synaptic current was accompanied by a small depolarization of the cell, most likely resulting from inhibitory neurotransmitter release. In
