Posts Tagged With: The Mountain School There's something about Vermont that encourages people to go it alone. The state doesn't require registration, and the single-track roads are wide enough to yield between fifty and seventy-five cars on a stretch. Starting a business is a breeze. There are no barreling urban freeways, but rather short stretches of paved twists and turns through farmlands and forests that edge the Green Mountains. The state has a free higher education college system, and the University of Vermont is widely regarded as among the best in the country. "We have 3,000 students, and there is a huge amount of unused space," says Campus Director Jessica Atwood. "I've seen it, and it reminds me of a lot of the first buildings we were here, where even in the 1970s there was still a lot of unused space." Last year, VPR and the Vermont Public Radio Network started a story about what had been the largest residential treatment facility in Vermont, the Mountain School in Northfield, a town of about 700. The Mountain School, set on a seven-acre property, started in the early 1960s as the first residential treatment center for juvenile delinquents. Then, in the 1970s, some of its buildings were converted to a residential treatment center for adults. The school was closed in the early 1990s. Then, in 2009, a developer bought the property and, under state guidelines, built the first units of a small apartment complex on the back forty. A year later, a few students moved in. Today, the campus is home to about a dozen adults who attend the school's "twilight"
