DownloadQ: Why isn't it advisable to use internal company passwords when using SSIS I have been reading about SSIS and Microsoft Data Services. It says it is best practice not to use internal company credentials for the connection strings of an SSIS package when using the Microsoft Data Services Platform. I do not understand why this is the case. Why can't we use company credentials when using the MS Data Service? A: This is a generally accepted best practice for two reasons. Storing company passwords in an SSIS package is not a secure method. Someone should not be able to obtain the password unless they have access to your SSIS package. Passwords can be stolen, are vulnerable to outside exposure, etc. Using an application setting when you are deployed to the company is much more secure. Application Settings allow you to write down passwords and user names in a secure location. If someone gets a hold of your SSIS package it's a lot harder for them to get access to passwords. I'm not sure how the MS Data Service works, but I would assume it has similar risks. The MS Data Services Platform provides identity and authorization access to an entire database. Anyone with access to the Azure SQL Database or your data store, or even a single database user has access to read/write access to all tables in your database. If you need to access certain tables or views for the purpose of cleansing data before the data is published to the end user you'll need to access individual database users. If you need to access a database that is only shared between a handful of people in your organization, you can set up that application setting and then only the people authorized to access it will be able to use it. If you are doing a cleansing and you need to grab the data out of the database and put it into an SSIS package, then you'll need to use the Enterprise Manager connection string. By connecting to the database using the Enterprise Manager connection string, you are giving a select group of people on your own domain control over the database you are connecting to.
