Q: What to do if your question gets flagged as 'primarily opinion based'? I have a question on SO (on meta I guess) where a moderator has flagged it as 'primarily opinion based'. I agree that it is primarily opinion based, but I think that the current explanation is not very useful. What do I need to do to convince the moderator that my question is not opinion based? A: If the question doesn't meet the on-topic requirements, and if it is not a duplicate, you should just let it be, and not delete or modify the question. In a case where a question does meet on-topic requirements, but a moderator has thought it was opinion based and deleted it, you need to flag the question for moderator attention, explaining the deletion. A: As @Humphery said, the moderator has simply had an opinion that it was not. That is pretty much it. You can edit the question to try and convince them otherwise, but the best thing to do is leave the question alone and accept the decision. If you did need to edit the question to remove parts of it, you would be able to do that after it was saved (as a suggested edit) - you don't need to flag for a moderator. The terms " 77a5ca646e
