Vitamin B6 (pyridoxal 5'-phosphate, PLP) deficiency in the postnatal period induces early alterations in the spinal cord of developing rats. The authors examined the effect of vitamin B6 deficiency on the development of the spinal cord. Sprague-Dawley rats were reared either on a vitamin B6-deficient diet or on a vitamin B6-sufficient diet from gestation until postnatal day (P) 21. When the animals were killed on P22, a shorter height of the first three cervical segments (C3-C7) and a thinner myelin sheath around the axons were noted in the vitamin B6-deficient group. On P22, protein concentrations in the spinal cord were not significantly different between the vitamin B6-deficient group and the vitamin B6-sufficient group. The rates of [(3)H]leucine incorporation into proteins from [(3)H]leucine-labeled cells in C3-C7 were not different between the two groups. However, the labeled proteins in the vitamin B6-deficient group were more fragmented than those in the vitamin B6-sufficient group. These results suggest that a deficiency in vitamin B6 during the prenatal and neonatal periods induces early alterations in the spinal cord of developing rats.
