Unfortunately, the CDL author and CPL involved in the case were also blocked from commenting on the decision. (Again, their comments were apparently not sufficient to convince the Court to overturn their decisions.) It is not clear whether another complaint filed by the four CDLs will also be litigated. The Court has not resolved the complaint that the CDLs filed against the GMC: The case has been continued until May 2014. The Court's decision casts doubt on the future of extensive use of CPL's in class actions by representing the so-called "super lawyers" of the nation. For one thing, if this decision stands as precedent, it will be more expensive to use class actions as mechanisms for generating fees for lawyers than it has been. For another, it could deter judges from approving massive settlements of class actions for fear that the judge may be deprived of the opportunity to enjoy favorable CPL. New York City has announced new initiatives to decrease its number of traffic citations.
