Bad: Mercury is found in about 80 percent of all homes, according to the Environmental Protection Agency. Good: Only about 1.6 million tons of mercury are produced each year. Better: About the same amount of mercury is released into the environment as is removed. Bad: Carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases cause about a quarter of the world's greenhouse gas emissions. Good: The United States is the world's largest oil-producing nation. Better: The U.S. is the largest oil-consuming nation in the world. Bad: Illegal immigration costs the average household over $1000 a year. Good: The 2001 immigration act raised the annual fee for citizenship by about $1000. Better: The average family income in this country is nearly twice what it was in 2000. Bad: The Internal Revenue Service refuses to release any information to the public on how much money the IRS has collected in personal income taxes for the last year. Good: According to the Cato Institute, the federal tax code was about half the size it is today in 1968, when income taxes were still income taxes. Better: The average American household pays less than 10 percent of its income in taxes. Bad: In 2003, d41b202975

The file will be saved to your desktop if you have Internet Explorer 8. At the bottom of this page you can download, or save to your OneDrive for Work. Introduction My first encounter with Microsoft Access was when I first started teaching. I created a quick electronic grade book for all of my classes. This included my Elementary ELA class and my Jr. High Social Studies class. These two classes were kept completely separate, there was no way we all could put everything in one book. As a result, the back of my grade book ended up being two books. I had to find a way to keep teachers and students separate. Now, while this is completely sufficient and most educators use a simple database (like Microsoft Access), there is one concept that seems to just get ignored and happens (without any correlation, or explanation) from time to time. That is; the separation of students from one another and any others. While it doesn't seem like such a massive piece of the wall when we put it that way, it is something that is often missed when working with databases. I've written other articles about data, but this one is about a specific subject; how to design a data separation database. (Want to read more? Check out my other articles about databases.) Why Separate the Needed Information of a Student? One school I worked at taught grades five to eight. The elementary school taught grades kindergarten through four; then we split the students right at the five through eight grade line into a Jr. High and a Jr. High School. More often than not, in a conventional database, all the grades are stored together. What happens is that the teachers are given the ability to type in and move information from one grade class to the other. They do this by tracking all the changes in the grades with a particular student. The information in these classes flows from one to the other as needed. It's a bit clunky, but it works. The teachers can work in one grade, add information to any student in that grade, and then move that information to the next grade. However, if a student is then transferred, all of the information has to flow again. Now, let's say that an elementary teacher wanted to enter a parent's name in one of her records. It can be
