Product Overview .Comparing self-reported versus objective measures of psychosocial work stressors and mental health among Chinese urban and rural migrant workers. The concept of migrant work has become more and more prevalent in China in recent decades. However, the unique characteristics and consequences of occupational stressors in Chinese migrant workers have been rarely researched, especially the interplay between psychological stressors and mental health. This study examined the reliability and convergent validity of three self-reported scales measuring psychosocial work stressors: the demand-control model of Job Content Questionnaire (JCQ), the effort-reward imbalance model of JCQ-EI, and a newly developed Work-Study-Dissatisfaction model (WSDM). The scales were compared with face-to-face-interviews and objectively observed work environment measurements of noise and workload, respectively. The study sample consisted of 80 migrant workers from five prefecture-level cities in China. For the JCQ and the JCQ-EI, the internal consistency reliabilities ranged from 0.79-0.87 and the convergent validity ranged from 0.43-0.69. For the WSDM, the internal consistency reliability ranged from 0.78-0.92 and convergent validity ranged from 0.53-0.82. The study
