the best option. You have a valid point. D_Ray • on Oct 10, 2012 2:51 am They can't just put together a list of red flags that not only do they have to turn into actionable questions or things to check, but also that the rep need to be able to check those questions and issue a response that clearly states no one has been found to have a past drug or alcohol problem, and based on a physical and mental check up they are acceptable to work in the NFL. If yes, then fine. If not, be prepared to lose a job. Again, simple and a bit of the NFL culture may be different from the norm, but I would bet 95% of rookies check out clean, and have no problem saying that to the NFL. I'm not knocking the perception of the safety aspect of the job, but if the rule is no alcohol or drugs, then 99% of the time the doctors are going to tell people they're fine to play. If that's the case, then make it so. Just enforce the rule and be consistent. If someone is clean now, they will always be fine. CTJ Snr • on Oct 10, 2012 8:43 am I'm sick to death of this complete and total amnesty for the NFL. I won't even call it a "public service" because it's damn sure not public. If someone is clean now, he or she will ALWAYS be clean. There is no room for amnesty here. Otherwise you're walking on eggshells and applying a lighter touch on everyone all the time. It won't work, end of story. And if someone DOES have a past drug or alcohol problem that he or she needs to know about, then it's incumbent upon the reporter to be up front about it. They are not the law. They are not the judge. They are not the prosecutor. They aren't even the jury. They're a part of the media and they're covering a story. Just like any other profession. Don't tell me that you're better than the rest of us. We're all on the same page here. Of course these guys are better at their jobs than the rest of us, because they're getting paid to make educated guesses and opinions on something that only ONE OF US

The exo-growth factor Shh is necessary for the survival of hepatic progenitors in the mouse. Progenitor cells are crucial components of the liver, as they are responsible for maintaining the proliferation of the entire hepatic parenchyma during fetal liver development and maintaining the differentiated hepatocyte phenotype throughout life. Here, we show that the Sonic Hedgehog (Shh) protein induces the growth of liver progenitors isolated from E14.5 fetal liver lobes. These progenitors could be killed by the combined administration of tumour necrosis factor (TNF)-alpha and cycloheximide (CHX) in a dose-dependent manner. Interestingly, the number of progenitors surviving the toxic insult was increased when the cells were incubated with the exogenous Shh protein. The expression of the specific receptor Patched (Ptc) was detected in the progenitors, whereas the expression of Smoothed (Smo), an activator of Ptc, was not. The effect of Shh was blocked by the administration of cyclopamine, a Ptc antagonist. These data show that Shh promotes the survival of progenitors from the embryonic liver and support a role for this mechanism in the growth of progenitors in the adult liver. Despite global efforts to support people affected by the ongoing drought in southeastern Africa, the water situation continues to deteriorate, according to the UN's World Food Programme. "People are already dying of dehydration and malnutrition because of the drought, which is the worst in the region since 2007. Already 1.8 million people were affected by food insecurity in Zimbabwe before the current drought,” Marco Lambertini, director-general of the WFP said in a statement. “The situation is now exacerbated by the high food prices of dairy and poultry, due to the prolonged drought, and the pressure it puts on international prices,” he added. People in the southern African country have been using their own water to meet their daily household needs, according to the WFP. “Based on international advice, Zimbabwean authorities told us to boil our drinking water before drinking it, but that doesn’t solve the problem,” said the WFP. “We need new ways of helping people to be able to survive. How can we be more innovative and resourceful to survive in this situation? How can we boost our agricultural production? In most of
