Temperature is one of the most important environmental variables affecting fish health. In general, it is generally believed that increasing water temperature decreases immunity and enhances growth. Here, we examined the effects of water temperature on several immunological variables, growth and survival in trout, Salmo trutta, during a 10-d period. One of our objectives was to determine whether increasing water temperature reduces survival, growth and immune responses compared to increased water temperature in a constant environment. We examined the impacts of temperature on these biological responses in fish infected with the fungus-derived pathogen, Gnathostoma rostochiensis. These studies revealed that infection per se can decrease growth and some immunological variables in brown trout regardless of the water temperature conditions. Alternatively, increased temperatures can slow host processes essential for both growth and immunity with less negative impact on fish. We conclude that temperature is a key environmental variable that must be considered when examining the impact of disease on physiological processes in fish.1. Field of the Invention The present invention is directed to an in vitro assay for anti-HIV-1 activity, and, in particular, to the use of 4-(3-bromo-4,5-dimethyl-1,2-thiazolyl)-2-biphenyl-4-carboxylic acid in the development of such an assay. 2. Related Art HIV is the causative agent for acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS). HIV infection is characterized by a reduction of CD4+ cells, which are T-helper cells, and by symptoms such as anemia, weight loss, diarrhea, and other gastrointestinal disturbances (Lampe et al., 1993. In: AIDS Diseases. p. 5-19. New York, Plenum Press). Approximately 30-40% of infected individuals develop AIDS within 5 years of initial infection. See e.g., Morris et al., 1991. Proc. Natl. Acad. RarÂ .Image caption Volunteers say the number of species in the north-east is declining Several rare and threatened plants have been recorded in an area of County Durham for the first time. Experts are concerned they could be wiped out unless steps are taken to preserve the species. Despite the numbers of the species increasing, volunteers from the Durham Ornithological Society say the number of species in the north-east is declining. The UK's rare plants are threatened by climate change, weeds and farming. Dr Ben Spinks, from the Durham Ornithological Society, said: "We have been recording rare plants in the north-east for almost 10 years now. "But I've been in there twice in the last three weeks and found three new species that had not previously been recorded in the area. "The information we have suggests that species that have been here for a long time are becoming more rare. "The north-east of England has the highest proportion of scarce and narrowly-restricted species in the country. "The first job is to find out whether this is a local thing or part of a broader trend. "Climate change, farming and the spread of invasive species are a large threat to rare plants." 'Plants in decline' The volunteers took time to study as many plants they could find - some of which had never been properly identified. Image caption Ben Spinks says the north-east of England is the most threatened part of the UK Mr Spinks said the region was "the most threatened part of the UK in terms of rare plants". The volunteers have come up with a list of the species they have identified in the north-east. Mr Spinks said: "I think the main reasons that these plants are declining are the invasive species of plants and climate change. "If we are not careful, the species that we have now will be the species that we have in 30 or 40 0cc13bf012
