The invention relates to a headlight system for a vehicle. In the case of the known headlight system, the light source is arranged in the headlight housing, and the headlight housing has two parts which can be brought together via a hinge in order to close and open the headlight housing. For this purpose, the headlight housing can be pivoted around a hinge pin arranged in the headlight housing in a roughly U-shaped manner about a center axis, on which end, in each case, a housing element formed in the manner of a housing is arranged, in which element the actuator is housed, on which actuator the reflector is arranged. This hinge pin is connected to the headlight housing such that it is movable relative to it. In the closed position of the headlight housing, the at least two housing elements, in which actuator and reflector are arranged, are each situated on a side of the hinge pin which is directed away from the headlight housing. In the case of the known headlight system, a housing element having an actuator and reflector, which are arranged in the closed position of the headlight housing, can be mounted with the aid of a receptacle of the other housing element. Furthermore, a flexible connection is provided between the headlight housing and the housing element, with the result that in the event of a crash, the headlight housing can be displaced in the region of the hinge pin and can therefore be moved relative to the housing element, and the housing element remains completely fixed in the region of the hinge pin. A headlight system of this type is known, for example, from DE 44 29 647 C2. In order to provide the housing element, which is capable of being swung open, with a receptacle which is open towards the hinge pin, the hinge pin is recessed
