Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a mixture for the thermomechanical fixation of fibres in cementing compositions, consisting of a solution of compounds of the type $ZO_{2n} \cdot HOX_{2m} \cdot SiO_2 \cdot O_3 \cdot 3H_2O$ which are introduced into the cementing composition, and concrete-compatible compounds and/or suspensions, and to a method for the thermomechanical fixation of fibres in cementing compositions. 2. Description of Related Art A modern method of the fixation of fibres in cementing compositions, intended especially for the processing of cementing compositions for the recovery of the hydrocarbon content from subterranean regions, consists in the introduction of fibres of a material which is normally hydrophobic and has a glass transition point $T_g > 300^\circ C.$, i.e. a ceramic fibre or a glass fibre, into the cementing composition for the purpose of transferring force to the ground, either because of the self-sustaining friction between the cementing composition and the earth, or from an external source. The characteristics of the fibre must be such that it will break down and will be broken down gradually when brought into contact with the subterranean temperatures of $400-1000^\circ C.$, and will then lend itself to a well-defined positioning in the reinforcing matrix. The cementing compositions, and especially the cement slurry for the recovery of the hydrocarbon content from subterranean regions, are adjusted for high temperatures of around $600^\circ C.$ to $1000^\circ C.$, so that the high temperatures at which the cementing compositions come
