Association of natural killer activity with mast cell degranulation in rheumatoid synovial fluid. The proportion of natural killer (NK) activity to total lymphocytes was significantly higher in synovial fluid obtained from patients with rheumatoid arthritis (RA) than from patients with osteoarthritis or normal volunteers. NK activity of synovial fluid was significantly correlated with the number of mast cells in RA. Some researchers have reported an increase in NK activity in response to non-specific stimuli in synovial fluid. However, we found that IL-2 and phorbol myristate acetate (PMA) stimulation of synovial fluid (SF) from a patient with active RA and from a RA rat model did not induce NK activity, but the addition of Ca(2+) significantly activated NK cells in the RA SF. The activated NK cells in the RA SF induced mast cell degranulation. These data suggest that mast cell degranulation in the synovium is a significant factor in the activation of NK cells in RA SF. 1.
