Bases de datos DB Loading.... Locate the File Find the Edit Text field "ID" value in the body of your raw XML data; that value should be unique and identifiable for all the XML documents in the dataset. (The value may be different for different documents, depending on the production environment, parsing order, etc.) Convert that value to XSD. To do this, paste the following into the Find field of the ID value you located, between the quotation marks. Download Paste the content of the above in a zip file. This is the only element (content) in the zip that should be updated. Publish Pull the published data. It's now in your data's edit window. Step 7: Server Configuration In Step 4, you added a Text Document for each instance of the XML data. If you are using a server to host your data, you can use one of those text documents to generate configuration data for the server, to avoid needing to hard-code server configuration settings into the original XML data. For example, if you deployed the data to a website, then you could store the configuration data in a text file in the same folder as the data. You can then use a program on the web server (like PHP or ASP) to download the configuration file from the web server and parse it to get 6d1f23a050
