The liner usually includes a plastic surface which is waterproof and is attached to the shell by, for example, gluing or adhesive. In addition, the shell of a cooler may include a metal upper shell and a plastic lower shell which is attached to the upper shell by, for example, gluing or adhesive. In either case, the attached surfaces of the shell and liner are configured to provide an air tight seal between the shell and liner to prevent the contamination of food or other liquids that are placed within the cooler. While existing coolers are typically formed of a shell and liner, various problems still exist. In particular, existing coolers have liners that are configured to be adhered to the shell by, for example, applying heat or adhesives. As such, coolers constructed in this manner often cannot be easily removed from the shell, and may become damaged during shipping or in the hands of the consumer. In addition, coolers constructed in this manner often are provided with a liner that is not disposed within the interior of the shell but, instead, is positioned on top of the shell and permanently attached to the shell. As such, the liner adds unwanted thickness to the shell and, ultimately, to the overall weight of the cooler. Accordingly, the present invention is directed to overcoming, or at least reducing the effects of, one or more of the problems set forth above. Modulation of inflammation-related genes by bile acids in enterocytes. The beneficial effects of bile acids in the ileum are likely to be due to the direct interactions of the molecules with the villus mucosa. Recently, we described bile acids that inhibit the induction of cytokines in enterocytes. To explore the effects of bile acids on inflammation-related genes in enterocytes, we treated enterocytes with a bile acid mixture and analyzed gene expression of the potent proinflammatory cytokine, tumor necrosis factor-alpha (TNF-alpha). Rat enterocytes were treated for 3 h with a bile acid mixture, and mRNA levels were analyzed with a kinetic approach. The administration of the bile acid mixture resulted in a downregulation of TNF-alpha gene expression at the transcriptional and translational level. Although the signaling pathways c6a93da74d
