the sixth part talks about the different uses of light painting, some of which are not even obvious. it also explains how to use lights and lights in combination with a broncolor bronze color led lighting system. the seventh part talks about the use of light painting for studio portraits, the third part talks about the use of light painting for street portraits, it talks about the use of light painting for fashion photography, it talks about the use of light painting for modeling and fashion photography, the eighth part talks about the different types of soft light that can be used for light painting, including the use of light painting for street portraiture. it talks about the use of light painting for portraits in a studio, we found that by layering the lights and using a slow shutter speed, we were able to almost perfectly blend the lights together. it also gave us a very even distribution of falloff, making it very versatile, a larger modifier might have been able to achieve a more extreme falloff and create a more artistic, lit scene, but we liked the organic, almost accidental look this one created, to further help us visualize the lights and where they were, we played with multiple metering modes. we chose to shoot with manual exposure and then did a spot test on our subject, we dropped the lights down, using the metering as a guide for exposure (metering for the ambient light), this gave us a way to see what the final image would look like and how it would behave on the subject. we were able to really control the light in the final product, because we were using a flash with a low output, it wasnt as crucial to have an exposure that was as exact as we would have on a daylight scene. because of this, we were able to take our time to get the settings right.
