The webcam software will be on-screen - it shows the face of the person who is broadcasting which works surprisingly well if that person's face is consistent. You can also zoom into their face and track their gaze. This part was actually quite useful, even if the viewer couldn't respond to the person broadcasting. This is more common with our hardware picks. The Steam-powered shooters are typically known for their high-quality images but two of the best webcam shooters have added quality improvements to their software. The first one is the Clear Capture feature, which displays more details in your videos and your video stream is much clearer. The second feature is the Webcam Bar at the bottom of the screen, which makes it easier to edit your video without losing the quality. If you're on Windows, this is a must-have feature. It doesn't seem to work with Linux based operating systems. The webcam will feature motion tracking, and this is especially useful if you are a streamer on Twitch. I recommend using the software that comes with the webcam though, which is Microsoft's Camstudio. The hardware itself will be checked for mounting options and available movement, such as a swivel ball joint or fixed positioning. Finally, any onboard microphone will be checked for clarity and its ability to filter out background noise, though it's worth mentioning that most webcams on the market have poor-quality microphones when compared to a dedicated headset or USB mics.

The choice to not include a microphone or autofocus capabilities will make it seem like a half-baked product for anyone just looking for a webcam, but the inclusion of those features often proves to be more trouble than they're worth for folk broadcasting on sites like Twitch or YouTube. As a result, the Facecam is beautifully optimized for the streaming community, with some of the best software we've ever seen on a webcam to boot. Features such as the ones offered by the Vernee CamVr range are quite simply indispensable for anyone who is into video chatting and livestreaming. You can get a crisp and clear picture for media or for chatting with friends and family at any time of day or night with the high quality webcams. And, that's why we present the top 10 webcams under 500 for 2020 for those who want to stream a bit of content online. Our budget-friendly pick is the Logitech C920, though it's not cheap at $220, it's worth every single penny. Though it's not a webcam that delivers superior quality per se, you get to use up to HD video clips at a 60fps rate. This is crucial if you are taking it with you and recording while streaming or being present with someone else, especially if you intend to use it on the go. The Eurocom MB1 is another one for the budget conscious and it comes at a bare minimum price of $99. It's a fully featured webcam and a great pick for those who want an all-in-one solution for their computer. If you are looking for a webcam that offers you a larger field of view than most laptops or desktops, then the ASUS Webcam C200 is for you. It has a 140-degree FOV, making it great for video calls and dual SIM devices. You can record video at up to 1280 x 720 pixels. 5ec8ef588b
