Does a wizard who casts spells become more (or less) effective in controlling weather and the like in the area that he or she is casting (for example, there are spells that increase the amount of rain or increase the speed of wind)? If the answer is "no", why is there no mention of this in the PHB? A: Nope. The Rules Don't Say Anything About That Your guestion presumes a great deal about what spells actually do - the best (and most likely) answer is: nothing. That's because while magic does "do things" at a level, we don't know exactly what they are. The best equivalent we have to try to understand exactly what magic is is the mana system, and the "mana" in-game is a measure of the power being exerted. In D&D, this power can be transferred to various things, and in the game, it's those things that are magical. But there's nothing in the rules that spells do anything besides translate mana into other things; you can use other rules to decide how well or how long mana translates to whatever. The reason there's nothing about this in the PHB, and the reason it never comes up in the PHB, is that it's assumed that wizards, at least, don't know about anything other than spells, and for people who can cast that
