Fonts are so much easier to use in Photoshop today when compared to versions in the past. Fonts now have a much cleaner, modern look, along with many new intricacies. Look, for example, at the different styles of font choices you can create. More importantly, fonts that are imported into Photoshop for the first time often have a border that looks like Adobe Illustrator's History frame. However, one of Photoshop's strongest features is that it just works. You can do whatever you want, including importing your own Adobe Fonts, and they work. I'm not sure whether to forgive Adobe or not for the exposure handling/expression feature introduced with version CS5. In earlier versions, Adobe had a very sophisticated tonal range adjustment feature. I'm sure that people could have found ways to abuse it. Given the program's success, I'm sure Adobe realized that there was a strong market for it, and wanted to offer that feature. They could have easily added exposure compensation, HDR or other exposure compensation adjustments to the image editor. Rather than do that, I'm afraid they went the other way and added features that don't really require exposure know-how to use. That's not to say that I don't think exposure adjustments are useful, I just don't think photographers should have to master them in order to use the program. They should be able to achieve good results by learning the basic concepts of exposure and how to make those adjustments. One of the really powerful features that LR brought to Photoshop is the ability to open and import RAW files using the new Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) application. In fact, they include a bundled version of ACR that works on-the-fly in the RAW editor. Problems with the bundled version have long been addressed by Adobe, a lot of which has been surfacing in Photoshop releases in recent years. You can also use ACR on the standalone application if need be.
